During the "tradério" period, the band's sound featured more synthesizers and more emphasis on electric guitars and synthesizers. The increasing incidence of nosocomial infections in children has been correlated with the emergence of extended-spectrum beta-lactamases (ESBL)-producing enterobacteriaceae. Given the increased susceptibility of such organisms to cefepime, the effect of this agent on the incidence of colonization by these micro-organisms was assessed. Screening was performed on admission and at discharge from the neonatal unit. Incidence of colonization was assessed and the number of infections was recorded. All infants were treated with intravenous cefepime for a minimum of 3 days. After 48 h of treatment, only 55 (18.1%) infants were colonized on admission; 27 (57.4%) were still colonized at discharge. Of the 200 patients, only 20 (10%) developed an infection, of which 12 (60%) were infected during the 48 h after admission. When compared to patients colonized at admission, patients not colonized at discharge were older ($p = 0.016$), had a lower birth weight ($p = 0.037$) and had received more previous hospitalizations ($p = 0.016$). After 48 h of cefepime therapy, there was a decrease in the incidence of colonization by ESBL-producing enterobacteriaceae. The use of cefepime for at least 48 h at a dose
