Ron Brynaert describes the process as used by various East Timor sources and believes that the teams, which comprise 3-5 journalists, have developed templates for such publications. "Regenerating" Newspapers Part 2 Ron Brynaert The New York Times has a team which comes to East Timor to train journalists, similar to what has happened in Latin America in the last two years. But the Times is a large newspaper and many East Timorese newspapers, small, are not. One of the oldest has been regenerated with a team made up of journalists from the most important networks in East Timor. There are 26 journalists in the team which has won an international award for its work. This team has had a lead role in regenerating some of the country's largest papers – the GRAH reports that "The increase in the circulation of the reports is impressive." Brynaert says that this is a model which can be implemented by the media in East Timor. "The key is to reduce the number of steps between the journalist and the story," says Brynaert. "In other words, the media can be left with the things they already know." Brynaert has published a paper on the process of regenerating newspapers in a number of cities and says that, in practice, the regeneration process is a series of small changes in practice, such as removing certain types of news stories. But the networks are worried about protecting their intellectual property. "The newspaper companies are a lot more worried d4474df7b8
