Sudden death caused by spontaneous coronary artery dissection: Three cases and literature review. Spontaneous coronary artery dissection (SCAD) is a relatively rare disease that can present as sudden cardiac death. The diagnosis of SCAD is usually not evident in death cases, thus there is a significant delay in diagnosis. The risk factors of SCAD remain unclear and the natural history of SCAD may be unpredictable. The authors present three cases of SCAD and review the literature. The three cases were middle-aged men who experienced sudden cardiac death. Cardiovascular autopsy, coronary arteries were examined with a light microscope, and the dissection sites were tested by immunohistochemistry. The dissection sites were observed at the intima layer, and the affected coronary arteries were mild dilated with chronic inflammatory cell infiltration in the media and adventitia of coronary artery. There were no atherosclerotic lesions found in coronary arteries. The cases illustrate that SCAD can present as sudden death. Furthermore, pathologic examination of coronary arteries found no significant atherosclerotic lesions, which may play an important role in the natural history and clinical manifestations of SCAD.

Association of selenium status with bone and blood biochemical markers in pre-menopausal postmenopausal women. Selenium is known to play a role in bone metabolism. A number of studies have also demonstrated selenium to be important for immune function. However, few studies have looked at the relation of selenium status with bone density, blood biochemical markers, and immune function. We determined selenium status in a group of pre-menopausal and postmenopausal women and studied the relation of selenium
