The synchronous cell division of kinetochores and centromeres during mitosis in cells from humans, mice and other species is demonstrated by two independent methods, one using immunostaining for kinetochores and centromeres and the other based on G1 DNA content analysis.

However, there is no direct method to identify synchronous cell division in cells of an unknown genotype. It is especially difficult to identify synchronous cell division in mammalian cells from tissue culture, which often have abnormal centromeres that are more difficult to detect. We have developed a new system to identify cells undergoing synchronous cell division and we have used this system to identify genomic instability in human cells in culture. We have also applied this technique to identify synchronous cell division in a mouse breast cancer model. Based on these studies, we propose to: 1) characterize and optimize the method for identifying synchronous cell division in human cells; 2) apply this technique to human cells from cancer patients;

3) assess whether there is genomic instability in synchronously dividing cells, and if there is, characterize the nature of this instability. We hope this research will allow us to develop a technique that will facilitate identification of cancer-related mutations, chromosomal aberrations, non-histone chromatin proteins and other genetic alterations that alter the balance of cell division during S-phase. In the long term, these studies may yield new strategies to prevent cancer and to treat cancer that have been mis-segregated.
