===== booi The yellow blog is actually the real article. The blogger said this (which is also present in the actual article): "At times, these actions have gotten so extreme that I've left a bug for a week or two in an upcoming article to really prove to myself that I am not going nuts. Then it would go back. It's either not there or doesn't matter. The important point is, I am not crazy." Maybe they meant to post this article but accidentally posted the yellow one instead. On the Usefulness of Generated-Volume Simulation: Inferring the Relative Importance of Shrinkage Factors in Single and Multiple Subvolume Simulation. PURPOSE: The goal of the present study is to study the impact of two key factors in the applicability of generated-volume (GV) simulation: the relative importance of subvolume shrinkage factors and the number of subvolumes. METHODS: The SHADOWX code was modified to enable the user to generate a set of DVHs using any combination of different subvolume shrinkage factors for a given external radiation source. A new technique for describing the output from a DVH is proposed in this paper. The results of the study have shown that the relative importance of subvolume shrinkage factors is influenced by the fraction of the generated volume of the system that needs to be replaced with a solid tumour. To minimize the required number of subvolumes, the optimal combination of subvolume shrinkage factors and output channels (e.g. points, tables) are also investigated. A subvolume of the patient's volume that is defined by a volume of interest (VOI) was generated using a modified SHADOWX code to obtain a set of DVHs with specified values for the subvolume shrinkage factors. A method was proposed to compare the accuracy of the treatment plan based on the standard DVH and the modified DVH by measuring the difference between the doses to critical organs. The result showed that a smaller number of subvolumes is needed to obtain the same accuracy of the treatment plan as that of the standard DV the issues in all sections of the course "Economics of Real Estate" for students of higher education institutions. It is written in accordance with the federal state educational standard of higher education and is designed to prepare for exams, tests and examinations. The theoretical material is presented in the framework of the three main areas: real estate economics, taxation and real estate management. The present edition may be used when studying the discipline "Real Estate". The manual covers all the main issues concerning the legal regulation of land relations. The questions of land privatization and the legal regime of land plots under real estate objects are covered. A great deal of space is devoted to the peculiarities of land plot turnover and state registration. A separate chapter is devoted to the issues of land management, including land lease. A detailed analysis of normative legal acts establishing the procedure for land resources management, use and protection of land and land relations is given. Peculiarities of state control over use and protection of land and land control in the Russian Federation are studied. Types of violations of land legislation and responsibility for them are also considered in detail. The concept and content of responsibility for violation of the land legislation is analyzed.
