Field of the Invention The present invention relates to telecommunications. More particularly, the present invention relates to a method and apparatus for caching data used in setting up a call in a telecommunications network. 2. Background of the Invention The number of pieces of telecommunications equipment that are capable of operating within a telecommunications network has increased greatly in recent years. Part of this increase stems from the fact that, for reasons of cost and efficiency, the network equipment is now often leased instead of sold. Another reason is that many of the new network applications are being developed for subscription-based services, where the equipment is provided and operated for a long period, and where the operator needs access to many of the same data, such as routing information. One area that has received a great deal of attention in recent years is the need for more flexible network applications that will allow smaller carriers to have access to the same data as the larger carriers. The complexity of the protocols used in recent years has made it very difficult for new network applications to be developed. In particular, it has not been easy to create network applications in which the data used in setting up the call need not be collected as the call is being set up. For example, if the call should be made to a number in a certain location but if the data needed to make the call are not available yet, the call should not be made. However, providing for the data needed to be available in advance is not currently a problem. In a

Here's another one but with a bear's head. And here's our Chewbacca. What say you? Do you like the design of the aliens in these concepts or do they just look... weird? George Lucas' original vision for the Star Wars trilogy was not far from what we saw in the classic films, but he had other ideas for the more recent prequels and didn't intend to make a movie trilogy but instead a serial. We would have seen Han Solo, Luke Skywalker, and Obi Wan Kenobi on the Death Star and a very different outcome.Here's a concept art piece of the first scene in the film where Obi Wan Kenobi asks Luke Skywalker to join him on the Millennium Falcon. This art was created for the Collectors Edition of Episode III DVD box set, released in September 2001. At the time of this release, the design of this character was not included in the movie but Lucas stated that he was not necessarily the wrongfully accused man, his name was Ian McDiarmid. The film's official title was then changed to Jedi - Luke Skywalker and his part as Obi Wan Kenobi.More images of the art and the context in which it was created.
