Pancreatic cancer: molecular imaging with radiolabeled antibodies. Molecular imaging using radiolabeled monoclonal antibodies is a relatively new and promising modality for imaging of cancers, including pancreatic cancer. Monoclonal antibodies are protein molecules that selectively bind to tumor-associated antigens. In contrast to conventional gamma camera or scintigraphy, molecular imaging using monoclonal antibodies has the distinct advantage that tumor-associated antigens can be visualized directly, without manipulation of tissue or blood. Several monoclonal antibodies have been explored for imaging of pancreatic cancer. One of them is trastuzumab, an anti-HER2/neu antibody. To date, most clinical studies have focused on the feasibility of antibody radiolabeling, biodistribution studies, and dosimetry in humans. In addition, the relationship between specific binding of radiolabeled antibody and patient outcome has been evaluated in several preclinical and clinical studies. Although the results have been encouraging, further optimization and standardization of the technique is necessary for routine clinical use.

Gastrointestinal motility disorders associated with epilepsy. Ion channel and transporter disorders represent a broad spectrum of clinically relevant disorders that can predispose to frequent seizures. In this review, we aim to summarize the current data on ion channel and transporter disorders that can underlie gastrointestinal dysmotility and seizures. Recent work suggests a link between altered glutamate transmission and impaired gastrointestinal motility. Moreover, rare congenital disorders affecting the brainstem regulate gastrointestinal motility by an excitatory pathway emanating from the central nervous system.
