subjects were exposed to filtered air (FA) or to filtered air containing 2.8 microg/m<sup>3</sup> of PM<sub>2.5</sub> for 3 hr. Small airway function was assessed by using a measure of the dose of methacholine (cumulative dose [CD]) that induced a 20% decrease in the forced expiratory volume in 1 sec (FEV<sub>1</sub>20), from a baseline spirometry. Methacholine responsiveness was assessed at 30 and 60 min after exposure. Lung function was assessed by using pulmonary function testing before, immediately after exposure, and at 30 and 60 min after exposure. The CD was significantly lower during exposure to filtered air containing PM<sub>2.5</sub> compared with FA at 30 and 60 min. PM<sub>2.5</sub> had no significant effect on FEV<sub>1</sub> or FEF<sub>25-75</sub>. At 60 min, the CD was significantly lower than the CD measured at 30 min for FEV<sub>1</sub> and FEF<sub>25-75</sub>. The reduction in the CD was 5.6% for FEV<sub>1</sub> and 8.9% for FEF<sub>25-75</sub>. We conclude that the reduction in the CD induced by PM<sub>2.5</sub> was associated with a decrease in the methacholine responsiveness of the airways. This study suggests that short-term exposure to PM<sub>2.5</sub> may have adverse effects on the small airways.
