Tailored therapy for the metastatic melanoma patient: a comprehensive discussion of the efficacy and tolerability of current therapies. The development of improved therapies for the treatment of patients with metastatic melanoma has resulted in dramatic improvements in survival rates. Although initially promising, these therapies have a dismal track record for overall survival. Although no single drug can cure melanoma, some therapies appear to have a better therapeutic index than others. Combination therapy has shown improved therapeutic outcomes in some patients; however, combinations can cause increased toxicity. Since most patients with metastatic melanoma die from their disease, a major objective in the treatment of metastatic disease is palliation of symptoms. For this reason, many melanoma therapies are given in a tailored manner to optimize the patient's response. This approach is exemplified in this review by the examination of data related to the efficacy and toxicity of therapies used in the treatment of patients with metastatic melanoma.

Clinical and molecular biological aspects of stress-associated illness: a critical review. This paper examines the clinical and molecular biological effects of stress and their implications in the understanding of stress-related illnesses. Various investigations are reviewed with respect to the stress-diathesis model of schizophrenic and related disorders. Additionally, brain imaging studies and genetic research on stress-related illnesses are critically evaluated. It is suggested that neuroendocrine and pharmacological research should be integrated with data obtained from genetic studies, brain imaging and behavioral research.
