The influence of bovine type VI collagen on contact-dependent cell communication in human fibroblast cultures. Exposure of normal human fibroblasts to soluble bovine type VI collagen led to a dose-dependent inhibition of their response to contact-mediated cell communication. The ability of cultures to respond to contact-mediated communication, as assessed by both proliferation and spreading, was completely abolished by 0.1 mg/ml of type VI collagen. Fibroblasts cultured in the presence of 0.1 mg/ml of collagen retained the capacity to proliferate when placed in contact with different collagen sources, such as type I, III or IV collagen. However, when subjected to trypsinization and subsequent reconstitution in collagen-free medium, the spreading potential of fibroblasts was restored. Similar results were obtained using CHO cell lines transfected with human alpha 1(VI) and alpha 2(VI) chains of type VI collagen, indicating that the effect was not related to human and bovine products. These results imply that type VI collagen is important in the development of normal cell-cell interactions and may contribute to understanding the relationship between matrix components and cell-cell communication.Want to book a cheap flight?
