REUTERS/Jonathan Ernst WASHINGTON (Reuters) - The U.S. Supreme Court on Monday delayed arguments in the last major national election law case before the justices until after the November 6 election, which means there could be no ruling in time to deal with the issue in key races. The high court agreed to review the Sixth Circuit Court of Appeals' ruling last June that upheld a Michigan law that will let voters use identification at the polls, including a state-issued, free driver's license or state-issued, free non-driver photo identification. The law also required voters to produce an accepted form of photo identification, such as a passport, a state ID card, a military ID or a student ID card. Some groups have asked the justices to step in before the Nov. 6 election to decide whether the requirement is constitutional. Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg has asked a question during a hearing on the case that indicated she supported that step. She also is considering a request to review a lower court ruling in Texas that upheld a state law that requires voters to present a photo ID before casting their ballot. The court has scheduled two days of hearings on both cases for Dec. 4 and 5. There has been a dispute over whether Michigan's law, known as Proposal 2, violates the U.S. Constitution's guarantee of equal protection by creating a different voting standard for different types of voters. Voting rights advocates say the state's requirement
