The geographical location of Canada and its neighbours should have an impact on the way we organize our lives, but is it that big of a deal? On one hand, many people recognize the value of being close to family, friends, and resources, while others understand the importance of being near to greener pastures. Regardless of why you choose to live near or far from the location you're in, the most important aspect of the decision is to find a location that's best for you, your home, your pets and your lifestyle. For Canadians, finding a suitable location is difficult, especially in the country's largest urban centres. However, when it comes to smaller towns and cities, the proximity to locations that are already established and influential can result in a much better quality of life. If you do decide to move to a new location, it's important to recognize that you can't just pick a random place. You need to consider the pros and cons of every possible location, including the following: Public transportation: Although bus and train stations aren't difficult to find, finding the best stations for your needs can be a hassle. So you'll want to visit the station before making a decision on where to settle. Consider the number of stations on your commute and the availability of stations with taxi service. Proximity to the employment opportunities you desire: Moving to a new location shouldn't be based solely on proximity to family or friends. If your plans are to work in a particular area, you'll need to find an area that is within an acceptable commute distance from your potential job. The quality of education: While the vast majority of Canadians are happy with their school systems, if your child will be in Grade 10 or 11 and you'd like them to have a better opportunity at university, then moving to a new location may be a smart decision. In addition to an education-based location decision, you should also think about the pros and cons of different levels of education. While school systems aren't always as good in rural areas, they can still be ideal for many families. However, if you and your family need a better school system, you should consider moving to a city that is closer to a university. Diverse culture: If you live in 1d6a3396d6
