Twelve different hard cheeses, made from raw milk and containing 6-8% fat, were analyzed for their microbiological, physicochemical, and sensory characteristics. The cheeses were made in large and small batches (50 kg and 30 kg). Staphylococcus aureus, aerobic Gram-negative bacteria, and Enterobacteriaceae were detected by the most probable number method in all cheeses. Numbers were very high in half of the cheeses, and the cheeses were used for consumer testing within 4 wk of manufacturing. All 12 cheeses were judged to be of very good or good quality, with the exception of the batch made with 50 kg of milk. The cheeses containing 6% fat were considered to have better flavor, whereas those containing 8% fat were considered to have better moisture. Salmonella, a presumptive indicator of poor hygiene, was not detected in any of the cheeses. Psychrotrophs were detected in all cheeses by the most probable number method. Of 12 cheeses made in large batches, 8 had more than 10^5 psychrotrophic bacteria per gram of cheese, and 4 cheeses had a total of 10^7 or more psychrotrophs per gram. The numbers of psychrotrophic bacteria in the cheeses made with 30 kg of milk were somewhat lower than those in those made with 50 kg of milk. This is presumably due to the smaller amounts of bacteria in the smaller cheeses. Retail inspectors must recognize that some of the "fresh cheese" they purchase and eat may be made with "hidebound" or "old" milk.Q: Keep data clean after deleting from ListView C# I'm trying to keep my data clean after I delete an item from my ListView.
