Did you mean by "the native language"? If so, then there is only the solution in Python def code_to_text(code): # Cracks the code and returns it in utf-8 decoded_str = codecs.utf_8_decode(code) return decoded_str with open(file) as f: for line in f: line = code_to_text(line) print('{}'.format(line)) you may need to change something in the codecs module to get the proper encoding The latest jump in the value of the pound is being blamed on a surge in consumer confidence, following a strong set of figures showing that the economy is performing well. That optimism has caused two significant changes to the value of the pound: the pound is 1.25 per cent more expensive than it was last week and the pound is also more expensive than the euro. The pound has risen 3.5 per cent against the euro and 1.25 per cent against the dollar since last Friday. A couple of factors are behind the rise. First, the LSE continues to experience strong demand as organisations across the UK and the rest of the world try to avoid sharp exchanges by using the pound. As a result, the pound has stayed pretty stable against the dollar, which is hovering around $1.57. Second, the Bank of England has recently hinted that the value of the pound against the euro and the dollar could fall, meaning that a lot of these recent gains will be reversed. However, the question now is
