Specifically, mutations in Fmr1 result in increased social and repetitive behaviors. To understand the mechanistic basis for this increase in social behaviors, we have developed a novel mouse model of autism. This model has revealed that Fmr1 levels are increased in the dorsal striatum, a region involved in action selection and the pathophysiology of autism. Moreover, dorsal striatal Fmr1 knockdown results in autism-like behaviors. The goal of this proposal is to determine how increased Fmr1 in dorsal striatum contributes to autism-like behaviors in a gain of function mouse model. Towards this end, we have developed the first mouse model in which Fmr1 expression is increased by three-fold in forebrain excitatory neurons. Using this model we will determine the function of Fmr1 in forebrain excitatory neurons. In addition, we have developed a conditional Fmr1 overexpression mouse model that will allow us to determine how neuronal Fmr1 gain of function leads to autism-like behaviors.Effects of glucose-insulin-potassium solution on ischemia-reperfusion-induced arrhythmia.
