Role of dopamine in the development of conditioned place preference produced by morphine. Four experiments were performed to study the role of dopamine in the development of place conditioning produced by morphine. In Experiment 1 the effect of dopaminergic blockade on conditioned place preference produced by morphine was examined in rats treated with either saline, sulpiride or haloperidol. Following pretreatment with sulpiride but not haloperidol, morphine (2.5 mg/kg, SC) induced place preference. This effect was completely prevented by concomitant administration of sulpiride (20 mg/kg, SC) or haloperidol (0.5 mg/kg, SC). Both sulpiride and haloperidol reversed the effect of morphine (2.5 mg/kg, SC) on the locomotor activity. In Experiment 2 the effect of increasing dose of morphine (2.5, 5, 7.5 mg/kg, SC) on conditioned place preference was studied. Increasing doses of morphine produced increasing levels of conditioned place preference. These results clearly indicate that dopaminergic system is critically involved in the development of place preference. In Experiment 3 the effect of dopamine agonist, d-amphetamine (3.0 mg/kg, SC) on conditioned place preference was examined. In control rats, d-amphetamine produced place preference. In rats treated with sulpiride, d-amphetamine (3.0 mg/kg, SC) failed to induce place preference. These results suggest that dopaminergic system may have an inhibitory role in the development of place preference produced by morphine. In Experiment 4 it was shown that a submaximal dose of sulpiride (10 mg/kg, SC), which failed to reverse the effect of morphine (2.5 mg/kg, SC) on locomotor activity in Experiment 1, could reverse the effect of the same dose of morphine (2.5 mg/kg, SC) on conditioned place preference. The results of the present study suggests that the development of place conditioning produced by morphine may require the function of dopaminergic system. Every Airplane Is Pressurized Airplane pressurization systems (PAS) maintain airplane cabin pressure at a desired level from takeoff to landing. Pressurization helps to prevent or minimize the development of dangerous conditions inside of an aircraft cabin, such as hypoxia, in which cabin air becomes saturated with oxygen and results in the formation of gases which can interfere with a pilot's ability to fly safely.
