A long term goal of our research is to better understand the way in which sensory stimuli, such as sound, reach the ears of a person. By understanding this process better, we can better understand the effects that impairment in this process has on normal hearing and age-related hearing loss. We have found that current models of how auditory nerve fibers encode information about a sound based on their unique frequency tuning curves and phase of the first harmonic in the human ear are inconsistent with psychophysical measurements of how people encode sounds in the brain. We have constructed a model to determine the reason why. The model has been incorporated into a computer program that can simulate a frequency selective auditory nerve fiber. We propose to use this program in conjunction with psychophysical data we have collected in humans and mathematical models of the brain to further our understanding of how people encode sounds. Our specific aims are 1) Determine the best fit between the models and the psychophysical data in humans. 2) Determine the best fit between the models and the psychophysical data in guinea pigs. 3) Determine the best fit between the models and the psychophysical data in chinchillas. Serbia's Premier League title hopes have been hit by injury woes, with Manchester City's Aleksandar Kolarov and Stoke City's Erik Pieters doubtful for the weekend. City's £34m defender Kolarov will be assessed on Friday at the City Football Academy in Manchester, with the centre-back having picked up a knock during Thursday's 5-0 victory at the Etihad Stadium. Stoke defender Pieters was forced off in the 16th minute of Wednesday night's game at the Britannia Stadium with a knee injury, with the winger ruled out for two to three weeks. At Stoke, midfielder Marko Arnautovic was brought off after 80 minutes with a shoulder injury. Aston Villa, who
