I've got a webserver (apache-based) running on a Debian box and I want to secure it against vunerability. I've got 4 CentOS virtual servers set up and I'd like to use these instead. What is the best way to do this? Is there a secure distribution? I want to have a separate webserver and sysadmin boxes for the company. Thanks! A: If you want to go really far you can set up a VM on your Debian machine where you can run a desktop version of CentOS and have it setup to be as secure and private as you like. That will allow you to leverage the existing Linux environment so it won't be a total re-write (as long as you set it up correctly). You can also build a custom install of CentOS that is as secure as you'd like (and quite a bit more secure) but you'll have a bit more work to it and it doesn't integrate as nicely with the Debian you already have. If you're looking for more of a quick install or integration into Debian then CentOS may be a better fit. I'd still suggest building your own as CentOS (which is really a Redhat derivative) has its own drawbacks and there are certainly better distros out there (not just '

I am also looking to "link" the user and their login within the database. Is there a built in function that can be used? Any suggestions? A: Using ASP.Net you can use Request.LogonUserId() to get the user that is currently logged in. If you use a WebApp, it is passed as a querystring parameter (?Id=the_user). Using VB.Net you can use HttpContext.Current.User to get the current user ID. Additionally, you can use Forms Authentication to store the user's 3e33713323
