The “realistic” physics engine is powered by these player movements. Features include more accurate ball physics, a more responsive and realistic sliding tackle, shot accuracy and ball control. The players’ physicality also means that the pace of the action can be quicker than in past FIFA games and players will need to be faster in order to make clever runs and passing moves. The most notable player movement feature is the player’s speed, which has been enhanced in order to be more like the real thing. Slower players now have reduced speed but can still accelerate and be faster when needing to dash to receive the ball. Faster players also have more speed and can outrun players. “Faster, more intelligent,” players run with more pace and also take more sideways steps when changing direction. The players will also adapt to tougher challenges and circumstances in the game. For example, in a 0-0 game, if an opponent gets the ball a mile away from goal and tries to dribble, the defender will hold the ball and start dodging towards the goal. When the player reaches the angle of the goal, they’ll make a run or a pass into goal. In another example, in a game where the player is defending against a player with pace, he will hang back a little and create distance, so the opponent can no longer have a run on goal. The player will then physically block the attacker and push him a little so he has to make a balance check and touch the ball or concede possession. On another touch, the defender will close to the attacker in order to move him out of play, the attacker will then have to hold up the ball and the defender has the ball in a one-on-one situation. This will usually lead to the defender glancing the ball away. But if the defender commits fouls, or if the attacker drops the ball, the defender will dive at the feet of the attacker and make the tackle. This system is used for more complex circumstances as well. If a player is tackled in an unusual situation, like a corner kick or a throw-in, the player will take an extreme backwards step. This will alert the other players that something is about to happen and prevents the defender from unintentionally committing fouls. Also, the players will now respect their own dead ball situations, like a player who has been struck, or if a player is taken out or knocked off
