To understand just how this tech is used to enhance gameplay, I got my hands on a review copy of the game a few weeks before release. Can you talk about what HyperMotion Technology does? FIFA is unique in that every player in the game has unique gameplay mechanics. For example, the player might be equipped with a variety of different player roles (defender, midfielder, attacker), but they have the same core movement mechanics. What makes the game unique is that these core mechanics are unique for every player. For example, a defender's movement mechanics are different from a midfielder's, because their roles require them to adapt their movement based on the situation on the pitch. The way that we did this was to integrate all the data we collect from our motion capture data collection and our further data collection through the Club and Player Development mini-games and match preparation videos. After collecting all of this data, we're able to say, "this is the movement that a professional footballer would use in a full-team simulation in real-time." This integration allows us to use what we've collected from the real-life players to ensure that the game flows and feels right. In the core gameplay mechanics, where is the motion capture data used? Within the competitive scenarios in FIFA, we use it in two ways: 1. We use the data to make the speed and acceleration feel right within each player's movement. We call this a "beauty pass." Instead of just having a player move normally, we shift the acceleration and speed upwards and downwards as to make sure that when a player is in possession, their movement feels right. A key moment for this is when the ball is in the air. How a player in the air is supposed to move is important, because it determines whether they can make the pass or not. For example, a player might want to pass the ball to a nearby teammate with the ball in the air, but they lack the acceleration and speed to make the pass in time, and the ball hits the ground and goes to the opposing team. The beauty pass helps us to make sure that the game flows and feels right. You'll see this in how players move, how they sprint, how their skill moves and how their jump mechanics feel. 2. We use this in the way that we animate each player's form. We currently have 22
