Roblox is an online platform that allows players to design their own video game, and share their creations with players around the world. Players are able to create three types of games: Action, Construction, and Role Playing. The games can be played on a variety of operating systems including Android, iOS, Linux, Mac, Android TV, Nintendo Switch, Xbox, Sony PlayStation, and Windows. Roblox is currently free to play in all major languages, but there are also in-game purchases available through Robux, the virtual currency. The game consists of a three-dimensional virtual environment called a world which is populated by avatars. Each player selects an avatar, or in-game character, at the beginning of the game. The players then begin to create objects in the world by typing in commands in the programming language Lua. Lua is Roblox's proprietary programming language, and the syntax and layout of the commands are designed to make it easy to create a wide variety of different types of game mechanics. The commands are saved in a scripting language called "BlocklyScript" which is then executed by Roblox. The results of the commands are then displayed to the player. When a player wishes to play their game, they create a game script to begin execution on a server, which was originally intended to be housed in a single central server. However, this practice was banned in 2012. The generation of the game takes place entirely on the client side. When a player first visits the game, the game generates a world for the player to explore. The player can then control the actions of their avatar using a keyboard and mouse. In the most recent version of Roblox, a game is run on two servers: a "computation server" and a "logic server". It is only possible to interact with the server that the player's avatar is logged in to, although using the Interactive Blockly plugin, it is possible for players to interact with the logic server. The computations needed for physics (for example, projecting where blocks are going to be in the future) are run on the computation server. The player can design their own game, or can upload games they've made that other users can play. In order for a player's game to be available for others to play, the game must be uploaded to the game's server in the "Web" category. Players are able to invite others to their world, and they are allowed to limit access to the world to their friends, or to anyone
